FRANKFURTER, U. S. IMMIGRANT AT 12, ALSO "ONE WHO BELONGS TO THE MOST VILIFIED AND PERSECUTED MINORITY IN HISTORY", BECAME MOST FAMOUS TEACHER OF LAW IN HIS GENERATION; KNOWN FOR INTEGRITY, GREAT INFLUENCE, PERSONAL MAGNETISM, WIT, CHARM, HIS FIGHT FOR SACCO AND VANZETTI; WON HIGHEST AWARDS OF RECOGNITION AS SUPREME COURT JUSTICE FOR 23 YEARS

Felix Frankfurter, retired Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, died in Washington after a heart attack. He was eighty-two years old. Justice Frankfurter was taken to George Washington University Hospital after being stricken at home.

As a long-time member of the bench and a teacher, Justice Frankfurter had a profound impact on American jurisprudence. His career spanned more than fifty years, says the New York Times, during which he served as a member of the Harvard Law School faculty, in Government, and as a Justice of the Supreme Court.

On April 5, 1962, Justice Frankfurter suffered a mild stroke late in the afternoon while he was sitting at a desk in his chambers. He received treatment at a hospital until the following July 14. When he failed to make sufficient recovery to carry on his court work, he retired on August 28. Secretary of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg succeeded him on the Supreme Court.

He had been in ill health ever since and had suffered two mild strokes. Mrs. Frankfurter, who has been bed-ridden for more than a decade, was confined to her home in Washington and was unable to be at the hospital when her husband died. She was told of his death by his doctors. They had no children.

In May, 1963, President Kennedy conferred on the retired Justice the Medal of Freedom, the highest award a President can bestow on a civilian.

The same year, the American Bar Association honored him with its gold medal for "conspicuous service to the cause of American jurisprudence."

There was a sense of sadness and emptiness in Washington over the passing of a man whose wit and charm and intelligence had enlivened so many dinner conversations and who had so exemplified "the unbought grace of life."

Justice Frankfurter managed, with the aid of a secretary, to keep up his correspondence with judges, lawyers and statesmen at home and abroad. Occasionally he made brief visits in a wheelchair to the Supreme Court, and would have his chauffeur drive about Georgetown and Northwest Washington, stopping occasionally to chat with old friends.

As lawyer, teacher, judge and goad to society, Felix Frankfurter was a significant influence in American life for more than a half a century.

His public career spanned the years from Theodore Roosevelt's Presidency to John F. Kennedy's. When he became a Supreme Court Justice, in 1939, he had already won a place in history as an adviser to Presidents, says the New York Times, the holder of a variety of Government jobs and a leader in the fight for dozens of social causes.

As important as his public life was his extraordinary private influence. His friends included many of the great in the worlds of law, journalism, government and scholarship, and he left his imprint on hundreds of students and law clerks who remembered him as they made their way in the world.

The Frankfurter impact on those who knew him — or were meeting him for the first time — was one of personality rather than of any particular philosophy.

He was the most vivacious, the most ebullient of men, bursting with joy and wit and sarcasm, eager to exchange gossip or debate eternal verities — but at any rate, to talk. He was by all odds the greatest talker of his time. Matthew Josephson wrote in 1940:

"Wherever Frankfurter is, there is no boredom. As soon as he bounces in — he never walks, he bounces — the talk and laughter begin, and they never let up."

Few who were ever exposed to it could resist his captivating personality. This was by way of contrast with his judicial philosophy, which was a subject of the greatest controversy, bringing denunciations from some who had been his admirers and praise from former enemies.

What disappointed the admirers was that as a Justice he did not always vote on the side of the interests he had championed as a private citizen.

He had been a strong supporter of labor unions, for example. But he upheld the constitutional power of the states to restrict what they — not necessarily he — deemed socially undesirable practices.

In 1940, in Thornhill v. Alabama, he joined Justice Frank Murphy's broadly written opinion of the court holding that picketing was a form of expression and that state prohibitions on peaceful picketing violate the Constitution's guarantee of free speech, says the New York Times. But in 1941 Justice Frankfurter wrote for the court in the Meadowmoor Dairies case, holding that a state could enjoin even peaceful picketing if it became enmeshed in contemporaneous violence.

"It must never be forgotten that the Bill of Rights was the child of the enlightenment," he wrote. "Back of the guarantee of free speech lay faith in the power of an appeal to reason by all the peaceful means of gaining access to the mind."

Another crucial area in the separation of the judge from the man was the right of persons with radical views to speak freely, or remain silent.

He had spoken out against Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer's "Red raids" after World War I. He was one of a handful of lawyers who, along with Charles Evans Hughes, protested them as a violation of civil liberties.

But as a Justice he voted repeatedly to sustain governmental action against the Communist party, its leaders and those accused of association with it. He simply did not find in the Constitution grounds to upset legislative action based on detailed Congressional findings as to the dangers of the Communist party — however much he personally disagreed with the action.

He was charged with having departed from the ideals of his great heroes, Justices Holmes and Brandeis, who so often dissented against the repression of radical speech. His answer — had he felt free to give one — might have been that Communism was not a world power in their day, and hence not a real threat to the country, but that in any event he was not prepared to upset these Congressional determinations no matter what Holmes and Brandeis might have done.

The landmark decision in the Communist area was the case of Eugene Dennis and ten other party leaders, decided in 1951. The Supreme Court, including Justice Frankfurter, affirmed their conviction under the Smith Act for conspiring to teach and advocate the violent overthrow of the Government.

Ten years later, in an opinion by Justice Frankfurter, the court upheld the requirement of the Internal Security Act of 1950 that the party register with the Government as a foreign-controlled Communist organization, says the New York Times. The court did not then pass on the 1950 act's penalties for registered groups, including a provision that no member could have a passport.

There was also the long series of cases arising from the refusal of witnesses to testify in Congressional investigations of Communism.

The first of these was that of John T. Watkins. The court reversed his contempt conviction in 1957 in a broadly written opinion by Chief Justice Earl Warren that seemed to throw doubt on the validity of all inquiries by the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

In a brief concurring opinion Justice Frankfurter said he understood the court to decide only a relatively narrow procedural point — that a committee must explain the relevance of its questions to a witness before requiring him to answer.

This turned out to be just about all the Watkins case did mean in the long run. In a number of subsequent cases — most of them decided by 5-4 votes with Justice Frankfurter in the majority — the court affirmed convictions of men who had refused to tell Congressional committees about alleged Communist connections.

Some of the liberal-minded citizens who deplored these and similar decisions understood, and disagreed with, the judicial philosophy underlying Justice Frankfurter's votes. But many others did not understand why he was often unwilling to invoke the judicial power in support of civil liberties.

One factor in the Frankfurter philosophy was the belief that it was undemocratic and dangerous for nine lifetime appointees to veto what legislators had done except in the clearest and most urgent cases. This belief was born of the nineteen twenties and thirties, when he saw a slim majority on the Supreme Court overturn urgent economic measures undertaken by state and nation.

A corollary view was that for the court to attempt too much, to press its ideas of wise policy, would be to invite its own destruction. This was another lesson of the nineteen thirties, when a self-willed court brought itself to the brink of drastic reform.

Finally, and not least important, was the thesis that reliance on the courts to preserve our liberties drained responsibility from those who should exercise it — legislatures and the people, says the New York Times. He wrote: "Where all the effective means of inducing political changes are left free from interference, education in the abandonment of foolish legislation is itself a training in liberty. To fight out the wise use of legislative authority in the forum of public opinion and before legislative assemblies rather than to transfer such a contest to the judicial arena serves to vindicate the self-confidence of a free people."

Those words are from an opinion that came as a particular shock to Justice Frankfurter's liberal friends — the 1943 opinion holding that a state could require children to salute the flag although their religion forbade the exercise.

Three years later the court overruled that decision. Justice Frankfurter, this time in dissent, wrote this most passionate defense of his judicial philosophy:

"One who belongs to the most vilified and persecuted minority in history is not likely to be insensible to the freedoms guaranteed by our Constitution. Were my purely personal attitude relevant I should wholeheartedly associate myself with the general libertarian views in the court's opinion, representing as they do the thought and action of a lifetime.

"But as judges we are neither Jew nor gentile, neither Catholic nor agnostic. . . . As a member of this court I am not justified in writing my private notions of policy into the Constitution, no matter how deeply I may cherish them or how mischievous I may deem their disregard."

Another important statement of his philosophy came in his dissent to the court's 1962 decision that the apportionment of seats in state legislature was subject to the constitutional scrutiny of the Federal courts. The decision upset one of Justice Frankfurter's most deeply held beliefs, that the courts must stay out of what he termed the "political thicket" of districting problems.

"There is not under our Constitution a judicial remedy for every political mischief," the Justice wrote. "In a democratic society like ours, relief must come through an aroused popular conscience that sears the conscience of the people's representatives."

A consistent theme during Justice Frankfurter's years on the Supreme Court was his insistence on fair procedure in the investigation of crime and the treatment of suspects. One of his best-known statements was that "the history of liberty has largely been the history of the observance of procedural safeguards."

Of all the members of the court during his tenure he took probably the most stringent view of wiretapping. He voted more than once to hold tapping a violation of the Constitution, but there was never a majority with him.

His same feeling for the inviolate character of the citizen's privacy made him give special importance to the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures, says the New York Times. He often dissented on the ground that the court was giving Federal agents too much leeway to search suspects.

He was the author of the significant doctrine that confessions obtained from Federal prisoners during unnecessary delays in their arraignment were inadmissible at trial.

To Justice Frankfurter absolutes were anathema. He thought that in every case the relative needs of liberty had to be weighed against the demands of authority. He thought the United States had grown on a process of cautious pragmatism, by trial and error, and he hesitated to impose rigid constitutional formulas on it.

A case that tested the issue nicely was one from Los Angeles in 1952. The police had pumped the stomach of a suspect named Antonio Rochin, against his will, and recovered morphine capsules. Was this an illegal search? A compulsory self-incrimination? If either, were they prohibited in state proceedings?

Justice Frankfurter avoided those pigeonholes. He said Rochin had been denied due process of law in his conviction because the recovery of evidence by stomach-pumping was "conduct that shocks the conscience." Constitutional law professors spoke jokingly after of a stomach test of constitutionality: If it makes you sick, it's not due process.

When in any event the court's resolution of a problem was subject to correction by Congress, Justice Frankfurter felt freer in devising the solution to a problem.

In the field of interstate commerce, for example, he did not hesitate to strike down state taxes or regulations as infringements on the freedom of commerce.

Congress could always pass a statute permitting the disputed state action. In the same way the justice would sometimes strain his interpretation of a Congressional statute to avoid a constitutional problem, reasoning that Congress could correct the construction if it was too far-fetched.

But when the Supreme Court was speaking as the ultimate voice in American Government — making the final decision on whether the Constitution authorized legislators to act as they did — he was very cautious in interposing his views against that of the Legislature. His caution stemmed from his view of the limited function of a judge in a democratic society, says the New York Times, a function not including the making of policy.

"If judges want to be preachers," he said in 1956 at a Harvard Law School ceremony in honor of John Marshall, "they should dedicate themselves to the pulpit; if judges want to be primary shapers of policy, the Legislature is their place. Self-willed judges are the least defensible offenders against governments under law."

The informed critics of Frankfurter the judge felt that he missed greatness by taking too narrow, too timid a view of the judicial function. They argued that he carried judicial self-restraint and deference to the Legislature so far as to miss the opportunity for creative inspiration of idealism in government and society. In short, they urged there are times when legislatures need to be hauled up short and may even privately admit they had strayed from permissible paths.

The great Judge Learned Hand wrote in 1957 that he considered Justice Frankfurter, because of his views of a judge's role, "the most important figure in our whole judicial system."

"It would be impossible for me to think of any other judge whose continuance in his duties I welcome more unreservedly," Judge Hand said.

President Kennedy used humor to point up Justice Frankfurter's position in a letter to the Justice on his 80th birthday, November 15, 1962, shortly after his retirement.

"You seem to be the same age as Eamon de Valera, to whom I was writing only the other day," the President said. "He was born in New York and conquered Ireland, while you seem to have reversed the process by starting in Vienna and taking charge of the constitutional traditions of the United States."

Felix Frankfurter's imprint on American life was the more remarkable because he was an immigrant and a Jew who rose to eminence in a day when neither anti-Semitism nor suspicion of the foreign-born was a rarity.

He was born November 5, 1882, in Vienna. His father Leopold, was a merchant descended from six generations of rabbis and scholars. When Felix was twelve years old, he and his five brothers and sisters followed their father to New York.

He attended public school, was graduated from City College at nineteen and, then, saved $1,200 during a year as clerk for the New York City Tenement House Commission, says the New York Times. He used the money to enter the Harvard Law School.

Between the law school and young Frankfurter it was love at first sight — a love that lasted the rest of his life. He was graduated in 1906 as an honor student, Law Review editor and friend of the school's great dean, James Barr Ames.

A few months later Theodore Roosevelt's United States Attorney in New York, [illegible], needed a young assistant. Frankfurter was the choice.

Mr. Stimson was another of the heroes who shaped his life. Justice Frankfurter spoke of him often, and in reverential tones, as the man who taught him the meaning of total honor and rectitude.

For four years the young assistant helped Mr. Stimson bust trusts, receiving a personal commendation from President Roosevelt at the White House for his work. In 1911 Mr. Stimson became Secretary of War and took young Frankfurter to Washington with him.

In 1914, at the instance of Louis D. Brandeis of the Boston bar, he was appointed to the Harvard law faculty. He had hardly arrived when he began his extracurricular activity, helping Brandeis to brief and argue the constitutionality of maximum hours laws before the Supreme Court and handling the issue himself when Brandeis became a justice.

As Archibald MacLeish once put it: "In 1917 he left Cambridge for a Washington weekend with Secretary of War Newton D. Baker, which lasted for two years." He was assistant to the Secretaries of War and Labor and, finally, chairman of the War Labor Policies Board, handling the wartime labor problems of the country.

He came to know Justice Holmes, who called the home he shared with other bright young men "the house of truth" because of their philosophical discussions.

During those same years Justice Frankfurter investigated for President Wilson the brutal repression of an Arizona mine strike and the conviction and life sentence of Tom Mooney for an alleged "radical" bombing in San Francisco, says the New York Times. He reported that Mooney had been framed — a finding roundly condemned by, among others, Theodore Roosevelt. Twenty years later Mooney was pardoned.

In 1918 Justice Frankfurter went to the Versailles Peace Conference, where he helped to represent the cause of Zionism. (Like Justice Brandeis, he aided Jewish and Zionist causes although he was not a religious Jew. His wife, the former Miss Marion Denman, was the daughter of a Congregationalist minister.)

He returned to Harvard in 1919. There he remained for the next 20 years, teaching bright students about the world of ideas and teaching them how to think. So analytical was one course, and so oblivious to the usual goal of progressing through a fixed amount of material that it became known as the "Case-of-the-Month Club." He became a major student and critic of the Supreme Court.

While he taught, he carried on outside activities at a furious pace. He wrote for The New Republic — he was an original stockholder. He was a founding member of the American Civil Liberties Union and worked hard for it. He was involved with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

But his most famous activity was in behalf of Nicolo Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, anarchists condemned to death for a hold-up murder in Massachusetts.

A Frankfurter article in The Atlantic Monthly analyzing the evidence and scoring the trial as a miscarriage of justice brought the case to national and world attention. Despite the horrified reproaches of the Boston bar and society, Professor Frankfurter fought for Sacco and Vanzetti until the sentence, now generally regarded as unjust, was executed.

Then came Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal. President Roosevelt was an old friend, and Professor Frankfurter quickly took on an advisory role probably unequalled by any unofficial person outside Washington before or since.

Those who were suspicious of him doubtless tended to exaggerate his influence, but it seems clear that the influence was at least substantial. He helped to draft legislation. He saw the President privately and often — weekly, even daily. Most important, he filled the new administration with eager and able young men who proceeded to remake the Government.

"I don't see why I am here as Postmaster General," James A. Farley was quoted as complaining, "since Frankfurter seems to hand out all the patronage."

The professor never saw it as patronage. He was simply helping to find able men for important jobs in a Government up against the crisis of the depression, says the New York Times. And he was encouraging his students and former students to undertake what he considered the high duty of public service.

In fact, he had sent his students to Washington all through the Republican years. That arch-operator of the New Deal, Thomas G. Corcoran, had gone to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under Hoover.

President Roosevelt asked Professor Frankfurter to be Solicitor General, but he declined. He also, turned down, in 1932, nomination to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.

By all indications he was to be a professor for life. Or so Justice Frankfurter said he had believed when he described the circumstances in the taped interviews published in 1960 as "Felix Frankfurter Reminisces."

On the evening of January 4, 1939, he was in his Cambridge home dressing for dinner. He was in his underwear when the telephone rang and "there was the ebullient, the exuberant, warmth-enveloping voice of the President of the United States."

For minutes Mr. Roosevelt explained why he could not appoint Professor Frankfurter to the Supreme Court vacancy created by the death of Justice Benjamin N. Cardozo.

"I was getting bored really," Justice Frankfurter wrote, "When he whipped around on the telephone and said, 'But unless you give me an insurmountable objection I'm going to send your name in for the court tomorrow at 12 o'clock . . .'

"I remember saying, and it is very natural to remember this very vividly, 'All I can say is that I wish my mother were alive.'"

His nomination was violently attacked by the far right, and witnesses appeared at a Senate hearing to denounce his race, his birth, and his politics. Senator Pat McCarran, Democrat of Nevada, asked the nominee whether he believed "in the doctrines of Karl Marx."

"Senator," he replied, "I do not believe you have ever taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States with fewer reservations than I have or would now, nor do I believe you are more attached to the theories and practices of Americanism than I am."

SECRET SOURCE-BOOK ON MAGIC IS DISCOVERED; USED FOR 1800 YEARS BY WITCHES, MAGICIANS

News of a remarkable historical discovery, the reconstruction of a mysterious manuscript on magic compiled by the early practitioners in necromancy, which has supplied the formulae for charms and spells used by magicians and witches throughout the centuries, has been released by The Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

This magical sourcebook was written by an unknown Gnostic sect that lived in the second century of the current era. They vanished leaving virtually no historical traces: their "textbook", known as the Book of Secrets, disappeared from man's knowledge, it is believed, after the eighth century.

The recovery of the lost Book of Secrets, one of the most fascinating documents of antiquity, is revealed in a report on a recent research achievement of Dr. Mordecai Margalioth, Professor of Midrashic and Geonic Literature at The Jewish Theological Seminary of America in New York. It is a report unexpectedly weighted with drama and suspense. It traces the brilliant feat of scholarly sleuthing that has finally succeeded in unraveling a mystery over a thousand years old.

What was literally a sealed book for so many centuries now lies before us, its parchment pages illuminating shadowy areas in the history of man. Far-reaching in its significance, the text of Sefer ha-Razim (Hebrew: The Book of Secrets), has provided scholars with the key to puzzling passages in the early writings. It has brought to light relationships unknown and unsuspected existing between the Hebrew, Greek, and Egyptian peoples of antiquity.

Few historians believed that the Book of Secrets had ever really existed. Scattered references to this "evil" manuscript occur in medieval writings, but these were generally dismissed as mere echoes of a lingering primeval myth.

However, a few years ago, Dr. Margalioth, while engaged in research on the Cairo Genizah, a cache of centuries-old literature discovered in Egypt in 1896 and still largely unidentified, chanced upon fragments which he was convinced were part of the original text of the nebulous necromancers' manual. And thereupon began a search so strange and so exciting that the cold facts read not like a research report, but like a narrative compiled by, perhaps, Conan Doyle, Rider Haggard, and Ian Fleming, working all three in collaboration.

One by one, the secrets were wrested from the Book of Secrets, long hidden from the knowledge of man. It has been established that this text, written in the year 189 of the current era, served as a primer for practitioners of magic in the centuries that followed, and that this was their sourcebook for magical practices and pseudo-prescriptions.

The magical manual contains a detailed inventory of spells and incantations that provide for a wide range of needs and many contingencies: there are prescriptions for talismans, amulets, and charms; formulae for warding off one's enemies, for rendering oneself invisible, for ensuring good health, fortune, and the conception of children, even for successful courtship. "If thou wouldst induce a damsel to love thee . . .", commences one such prescription, which proceeds to elaborate the recommended formulae of the day!

The manuscript that is the cause of so much excitement and elation in the Seminary has provided scholars with one of the first opportunities for close study of the magistral rites and practices, as they were prescribed by the masters of old. Never before has such an authoritative "book of rules" come to light. It unfolds a fascinating record of the superstitions and the sorcery, the terrors and the taboos that dwelled in the minds of men from earliest times, relics of which may still lurk in the world today.

Yet there are aspects of even greater significance than the intrinsic interest of the magical manual itself. With its reappearance, scholars have gained a rare insight on the authors. Very little is known about the strange philosophico-religious Jewish Gnostic sects that existed in the early centuries of the current era. They disappeared leaving virtually no documentary records for posterity.

Of primary importance to scholars is the evidence established by this text of the close cultural relationship that existed between the Hebrew, Greek, and Egyptian peoples of that period. The practices described by the Jewish Gnostics disclose the ritual for a pantheistic pattern of magical incantation, evidence that they had borrowed largely from their pagan neighbours. It involves an extensive panoply of gods, the central figure of which was Helios the sun-god: it lists the angelic hierarchy, and details the prescribed duties and powers of each angel.

The language is Palestinian Hebrew, with numerous Greek phrases interpolated in transliterated form. Predominating over the style and spirit of the work is the influence of the Egyptian schools of sorcery, acknowledged archmasters in the magical arts. Thus, the Book of Secrets, in content and form, illustrates that a tions of the world to make available any information pertaining to Nazi crimes not yet investigated.

GERMAN CABINET SUPPORTS NEW SENTIMENT FOR CRIMES LAW EXTENSION

It noted that much additional material had come in from Eastern bloc states and that officials of East Germany had declared that they had "tons" of documents relating to war crimes that had not yet been sifted twenty years after the war's end.

"The suspicion of propagandistic misuse (of these materials) is hardly avoidable," the Government said. It concluded in its report, "that contrary to the previous assumption, the possibility cannot be excluded that new punishable acts will become known after May 8, 1965, which would necessarily occasion further investigation."

New information aside, informed observers believe that the Cabinet decision on the statute was in large part influenced by a shift in political sentiment recently.

West German opinion on extending the statute may have been ambivalent last fall, but there seems to be wide sentiment for extension today, says the New York Times. This sentiment appears to have been reinforced by the belief that West Germany let Israel down when it cancelled arms shipments to her under pressure from the United Arab Republic.

FRANKFURTER WON HIGHEST AWARDS OF RECOGNITION AS SUPREME COURT JUSTICE FOR 23 YEARS

He was confirmed by voice vote of the Senate, without objection.

Over the years political conservatives, in tones that suggested they were rubbing their eyes in disbelief, came to acknowledge that Felix Frankfurter had been no radical on the Supreme Court but a force for stability and moderation. A particularly genuine tribute came in 1958 from Senator John W. Bricker, Ohio Republican, says the New York Times, who said their differences in political outlook made him the more respect the Justice's performance on the bench.

Mr. Justice Frankfurter arrived in the United States at the age of twelve unable to speak a word of English, yet he made himself the most famous American teacher of law of his generation, says the London Times; became a considerable political power during Roosevelt's New Deal, and during the last twenty years of his life achieved as a Justice of the Supreme Court, a great reputation for intellectual integrity and judicial-mindedness.

As a teacher Frankfurter won for himself an outstanding reputation. He was fond of teaching by the process of question and answer, goading his students with a biting tongue. But Frankfurter's influence went far beyond that of a teacher in the narrow sense. He was once described as "a trainer of prophets who has made the Harvard Law School a sort of racing stable for liberal lawyers."

He kept his students in touch with the world outside, and, more important, perhaps, made it a policy to encourage brilliant pupils to enter the service of the government, whatever its political complexion, and maintained close contact with them. Even during the Republican twenties, when the liberal intellectuals ceased to command any great influence in American politics, Frankfurter managed to keep open his lines to Washington.

From the Supreme Court he continued to send out into the world a succession of brilliant young law clerks, most of whom remained deeply affected by the experience of working for him and devoted to him personally. Some of them, too, found their way into government service and eventually into President Kennedy's Administration.

Frankfurter made himself the acknowledged authority on the procedure and jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, contributing a sessional article on the cases that came before it to the Harvard Law Review and writing "The Business of the Supreme Court" in collaboration with James M. Landis. He also became widely known as the exponent of a government-sponsored policy of social reform.

In the twenties Frankfurter gave his help in a number of causes celebres involving labour legislation, civil liberties, and social welfare.

The advent of Franklin Roosevelt as President of the United States inaugurated the period of Frankfurter's greatest influence in Washington. When he was Governor of New York State, says the London Times, Roosevelt frequently called Frankfurter to Albany and Frankfurter wholeheartedly supported Roosevelt's nomination as candidate for the Presidency.

Frankfurter's influence from 1933 onwards was both direct, because of his friendship with Roosevelt, and indirect because of the proteges whom he was able to place in the service both of the regular departments of government and of the numerous agencies which proliferated under the New Deal.

Frankfurter's contacts with Washington had been strengthened four years earlier when his old chief, Henry Stimson, had taken office under Herbert Hoover, and it was Frankfurter who suggested Thomas Corcoran as Special Counsel to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the instrument with which Hoover hoped to stem the tide of depression.

Corcoran acquired an influential position under Roosevelt and he was joined by other pupils of Frankfurter such as Benjamin Cohen, John Winant, and David Lilienthal. In those days a recommendation from Frankfurter was said to be a sure passport to a position under the Administration.

"Frankfurter's whole life has been a preparation for the Supreme Court, and his appointment has an aesthetically satisfying inevitability." So wrote The Nation, of New York, on January 14, 1939, a few days after Roosevelt had sent to the Senate his nomination of Frankfurter to the Bench.

The appointment was confirmed without dissent although in the intense feeling which was raised against Franklin Roosevelt's policies Frankfurter had become an object of attack, personal as well as political, as a "hidden hand" that was dominating the government. It was not so very hidden. Frankfurter himself was apt to give an impression of exercising great influence, although he never sought any elective office or any public part in politics.

Frankfurter's elevation to the Supreme Court came after Roosevelt had been rebuffed in his attempt to "pack" the court, which had declared unconstitutional much New Deal legislation, says the London Times. (It is said, incidentally, that Frankfurter had given the President prior warning that many of these laws would never be upheld by the Supreme Court.)

Although Supreme Court Justices traditionally eschew the slightest involvement in public controversies, Justice Frankfurter appeared as a witness in the trial of Alger Hiss for perjury, testifying to the good reputation of Hiss, says the New York Herald Tribune. He did so on request of counsel for Hiss, along with the late Justice Stanley Reed, and declared that the reputation of an accused man being a very relevant matter, it was his duty to testify.

Neither he, Justice Reed, nor Justice Tom Clark, who had participated in preparation of the Hiss case as Attorney General, joined in the deliberations that resulted in an affirmation of the Hiss conviction by a 6-to-0 vote.

Almost from the time he took his seat on the Supreme Court bench, he was known for two characteristics. One was his insistence on attention to the most minute detail and his sharp questioning of lawyers who appeared before the Court. His associates frequently grumbled that his tactics delayed proceedings.

The other was his proclivity for writing separate opinions, even when he concurred with the majority. He undoubtedly wrote more individual opinions than any other Supreme Court Justice.

His whole record of "judicial restraint" made it probable that he was responsible for the unanimity of the court in its decision on school segregation in 1954 and in the wording of that decision.

The formula calling for desegregation "with all deliberate speed" calmed the fears of some members concerning the results of immediate, drastic enforcement. It was noted at the time that Justice Frankfurter had used the identical phrase in at least three earlier opinions.

His definition of "deliberate speed" by no means allowed for flouting the law as laid down by the court, as was evidenced by the opinion he wrote in another integration case four years later.

Concurring with the majority opinion in the Little Rock desegregation controversy in November, 1958, Justice Frankfurter wrote, in a much-quoted opinion, that states could not avoid integration by "evasive schemes," says the New York Herald Tribune, that the court's interpretation of the Constitution was the supreme law of the land.

"Our kind of society," he went on, "cannot endure if the controlling authority of the law as derived from the Constitution is not to be the tribunal specially charged with the duty of ascertaining and declaring what is the supreme law of the land."

He declared that experience had attested that local habits and feelings "will yield, gradually though this be, to law and education. . . . Deep emotions have no doubt been stirred. They will not be calmed by letting violence loose — violence in defiance employed and encouraged by those upon whom the duty of law observance should have the strongest claim — nor by submitting to it under whatever guise employed.

"Only the constructive use of time will achieve what an advanced civilization demands and the Constitution confirms."

On another occasion, he wrote a majority opinion that upset an old legal principle that suit cannot be brought against a sovereign. The government of Nationalist China sued the National City Bank of New York to recover $200,000 it had deposited there, says the New York Herald Tribune. The bank filed a counter-suit for $1,634,432 based on defaulted treasury notes of the Chinese government.

In upholding the bank's right to sue in a case first brought by a "sovereign," Justice Frankfurter wrote: "We have a foreign government invoking our law but resisting a claim against it which . . . would curtail its recovery. It wants our law, like any other litigant, but it wants our law free from the claims of justice."

Justice Frankfurter once urged: "The court's authority — possessed neither of the purse nor the sword — ultimately rests on sustained public confidence in its moral sanctions. Such feeling must be nourished by the court's complete detachment, in fact and appearance, from political entanglements and by abstention from injecting itself into the class of political forces in political settlements."

SECRET SOURCE-BOOK ON MAGIC IS DISCOVERED; USED FOR 1800 YEARS BY BY WITCHES, MAGICIANS

communion existed between the "magic Circles" of the three peoples at that period.

At a convened session of the American Academy for Jewish Research, before an august assembly of historians and savants, Dr. Margalioth, presented the far-reaching implications to scholars of the reconstructed Sefer ha-Razim. His address marks the culmination of a momentous adventure in time and space. For beyond the historical significance of this manuscript is the fascinating story of detection and dedication; the search by a scholar-sleuth over thousands of miles, following a trail of clues scattered across four continents like the fragments in a comic paperchase.

After identifying the first fragments, Dr. Margalioth was convinced that a study of all Genizah archives would yield more clues about the Book of Secrets. Sherlock Holmes might well have declined to reopen a case so long interred in the recesses of the past, but the amateur detective, a scholar whose life had been dedicated to historical truth, was not discouraged. Bringing to the case the force of a powerful analytical mind, sharpened by years of Talmudic study and reasoning, he set himself to assemble the evidence.

His itinerary took him across the continents, wherever Genizah collections were to be found. Travelling to and fro between the great libraries of Rome and Jerusalem, Budapest and Boston, Paris and Philadelphia, Oxford and Cambridge he pored over mountains of manuscript material, seeking references to the lost manuscript of magic amongst the damaged pieces of parchment. And some of the material he found close at home, in the Rare Book Room of The Jewish Theological Seminary of America, which houses the largest Genizah collection in the United States.

Meticulously he examined references, assembled pages, microfilmed copies, uniting minute shreds of literae scripti that had been separated for centuries, literally worlds apart. Patiently, he followed the long parchment trail which led him finally behind the Iron Curtain. Since a large Genizah collection was known to be in the possession of the Leningrad Library, Dr. Margalioth made an application to the Soviet Minister of Education and Culture, asking to examine these archives. He received permission to do so, in the summer of 1964, and he was courteously received by the officials of the Leningrad Library.

All through the hot summer months the professor pored over the Antonin fragments, and his finds exceeded even his highest hopes. The Russians undertook, under a reciprocal agreement, to ship to New York the microfilm of the vital fragments. A few weeks ago the promised reel arrived from the Soviet Union. It contained copies of eighty Genizah fragments, including an entire page of the lost manuscript on magic. This was the last major part missing from the reconstructed Sefer ha-Razim.

Basically, we now know the entire text of the missing manuscript, which is some sixty pages in length. It has been placed together from hundreds of fragments, from texts written in Hebrew, Arabic, Latin, and Greek, but never more than two leaves from any one manuscript. Dr. Margalioth explained that although some of the "linking" passages have not yet been found in the original, he has been able to reconstruct these parts from 'censored' medieval versions. The task of putting together the various pages in their correct sequence was unexpectedly simplified by the order in which the manuscript was written: it followed a numerical sequence, based on the seven legendary planes of heaven.

It is not known exactly when the Book of Secrets disappeared from human ken, but it is believed that it became "lost" after the tenth century. We do know, from references in later centuries, that traces of its influence lingered for a long time after it vanished. The medieval writers were evidently in dread of the work, referring to it in the most condemnatory terms as the "evil Sefer ha-Razim". Little wonder that the rabbis, guarding against the infiltration of pagan practices, directed their heaviest thunder against the aberrations of the Jewish Gnostics and their devious writings.

Asked about the years of concentrated study, the fatigue of the frequent journeys, the hardships and sometimes the disappointments that he underwent, Professor Margalioth smiled a secret smile. For the man who contributs to knowledge for mankind, reward rarely takes material form. But there is a rare and esoteric joy in adding to the measure of man's wisdom. And there is the joy of establishing fraternal communion, in the brotherhood of scholars everywhere. Professor Margalioth spoke with great warmth of the cordiality with which he was received by scholars in the many countries he had visited.

Of the Soviet visit he recalled the one incident that dramatically captures the essence of the scholar's joy, the great moment of discovery: "I sat in the waiting room of the great Library," he recalled, "wondering what would be the outcome of this long journey. It had taken so much effort to bring about. And then they brought me the first box of Genizah fragments, and the first page, yes, the first page, my eye fell upon — was the missing page from Sefer ha-Razim."

Jewish Representation On Protestant School Board Of Greater Montreal

The executive of the Eastern Region of the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Special Congress Committee on Position of Jews in the Educational System of Quebec, at a joint meeting held on February 17, unanimously approved of the recommendations worked out by Samuel Godinsky, Q.C., on behalf of the Canadian Jewish Congress, in a series of discussions with T. P. Howard, Q.C., legal counsel for the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal, with regard to Jewish representation on the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal.

As indicated earlier, the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal is applying for a Private Bill to be presented to the present session of the Legislature of Quebec for authority to increase its present membership from 16 to a total of 25, of whom five will be of the Jewish faith. The Jewish representatives will be named by the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council after consultation with an institution widely representative of the Jewish Community in the territory under the jurisdiction of the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal.

The discussions were summarized in a memorandum submitted by Mr. Godinsky to the Protestant school authorities, which indicated the various areas of concern and the possible long range solutions which would permit the seating of Jews on all local Boards and the position of children attending Jewish Day Schools and requests for financial grants for such children which may be forthcoming in the future. The press statement on the proposed new legislation recognized that "while other solutions exist, all of them require further study because of their complexity and their implications" and that negotiations have been conducted "with a view to finding an initial solution that could be implemented quickly."

A unanimous vote of appreciation was adopted for Mr. Godinsky and for Harold Lande, Q.C., who is the chairman of the Special Committee. The memorandum summarizing the discussions was fully approved.

There was unanimous agreement that efforts be pursued to secure the franchise of Jewish residents in those areas in which Protestant schools are so constituted that Jews ought to be eligible both for voting and for sitting on the Boards.

Leon Kronitz, chairman of the Region, presided, and those present included: Monroe Abbey, Q.C.; E. E. Barkoff, Rabbi M. S. Cohen, A. Eaton, Rabbi S. Frank, Samuel Godinsky, Q.C.; Edmund Gordon, Harold Lande, Q.C.; Philip Levy, Rabbi M. Lewittes, Mrs. William Malen, Prof. Perry Meyer, M. H. Myerhoon, Q.C.; Murray Spiegel, Rabbi I. Teicher, A. H. J. Zibelin, Q.C., and the assistant treasurer of Congress and the associate education director.

The Protestant School Board, in a public notice inserted in the daily newspapers, gave notice of its intention to apply to the Legislature of Quebec for "the passing of an Act concerning education in the territory of the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal", including provisions for "increasing the number of members of the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal so as to provide for Jewish representation on the Board".

The Montreal Star (February 18), in an editorial entitled "Commendable Action However Belated", said:

"The efforts of the Jewish community in Quebec to obtain an adequate voice in the conduct of school affairs through the years have been painful. The breakthrough has come in some other communities and a marked advance is signalled by the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal in its plan to open its ranks to the big minority group for the first time.

"It is not all signed and delivered yet, however. But the board's formal notice that it will seek authority of the Legislature to lift the veil of silence is encouraging. We hope that the response of the Legislature is as commendable, and in keeping with the admirable new philosophy of education which permeates the whole government establishment.

"There may be a few remaining obstacles rooted in the past to overcome. As Saul Hayes commented once during a discussion of the over-all problem, if there had been more Jews around in 1867, the constitutional guarantees for the rights of vying Christian groups probably wouldn't have turned out to be handicaps for non-Christians. The Privy Council itself noted a generation ago in connection with a celebrated school case, 'it is difficult to see how the Legislature can effectively exercise the power so entrusted to it unless it is to have a large measure of freedom to meet new circumstances and needs as they arise'.

"For too long such circumstances and needs have been ignored. If the requested legislation is approved, however, five Jewish members will be added to the Greater Montreal board as members-at-large. By naming them at large the board avoids the necessity of having them first named or elected as members of the constituent local commissions where, unfortunately, parochial prejudices might still prevail.

"The final volume of the Parent Commission Report will deal extensively with the organization of the public school system in its confessional aspects. Out of it may come marked changes in the structure as we now know it. Possibly the step now under way will be overtaken and many of the other anomalies which exist wiped out in due course. Whatever the possibilities for the future, however, the current move is a positive one to correct rampant injustice".

AMBASSADOR TO U. S. ANSWERS JEWISH ATTACK AGAINST GERMANY

The following appeared as a letter to the New York Times from Heinrich Knappstein, German Ambassador to the United States:

I have read with profound anguish the advertisement in The New York Times of February 18 which was signed by the "Jewish War Veterans of the United States of America." Permit me to say that I was appalled both by its contents and its language.

I deeply regret this attack on a Government and a people who have done, for a great many years, everything in their power — as far as this is possible at all — to make up for the past in helping the young State of Israel as well as the Jewish victims everywhere. I know that a great many responsible leaders and members of Jewish organizations share my disappointment, and I have been gratified by their having expressed this to me.

As The Times has reported correctly — and as the leaders of the Jewish War Veterans are fully aware — no final decision has yet been made with regard to the statute of limitations for crimes committed under the Hitler regime. The German Parliament and Government are still striving to find a just and fair solution to this problem.

It is the intention of the German political leadership to find a legal method to make sure that every Nazi criminal can be brought to justice also after May 8, 1965.

The German Government has also done everything in its power to bring back German experts from the United Arab Republic. However, there are certain limits set to what a democratic government can achieve in such a situation. If these experts were American citizens, for instance, the United States Government would likewise find itself unable to enforce their return.

The German Government has not broken any agreement with the Israeli Government. We have faithfully kept every commitment under the Reparations Agreement with Israel of 1952.

Seven hundred and fifty million dollars worth of goods has flowed into Israel from Germany. In addition $112.5 million have been paid to Jewish organizations outside of Israel. Restitution to individuals, mostly Jews, who suffered under the Hitler regime, has now reached at least 55 billion.

With respect to the military aid — 80 per cent of which has already been delivered — the German Government is still trying to arrive at a negotiated settlement with Israel which would take into account the vital interests of both parties.

We also believe that it would create a great danger to these very people of Israel if the doors were opened to increased Communist influence in the Arab countries through recognition by the United Arab Republic of the Ulbricht regime.

I would have hoped that after all the efforts undertaken over such a long period of time to help the State of Israel we would find more understanding for our difficult situation. Our overriding national interest is at stake: the reunification of our divided country.

I feel that boycotts and exaggerated propaganda campaigns are no solution in such a situation, where we need calm counsel from our friends. Suspicion and hatred only cloud the vision and complicate the issue even more.

The German people and my Government will continue to honor the obligations from the past and to help the state and the people of Israel in every possible way. It would cause us great sorrow if the efforts made so far by the entire German people should now be forgotten.

German Cabinet Supports New Sentiment For Crimes Law Extension

The West German Cabinet voted unanimously to support the proposed extension of the statute of limitations for the prosecution of Nazi war criminals beyond the May 8 deadline. A Government statement said that the decision was based on the fact that new evidence indicated that criminal acts committed during World War II would go unpunished, says the New York Times, if the twenty-year statute were allowed to expire as scheduled.

The vote in effect reverses the decision last November 5 when the Cabinet declared that legal obstacles prevented extension of the statute. Chancellor Ludwig Erhard said at the time that he disagreed with that decision but would go along with his Cabinet.

However, the Government took pains in a gingerly worded statement to note that it had not specifically reversed its previous decision.

"The Federal Government," the statement said, "will support the German Bundestag (lower house of Parliament) in its efforts to create the possibility of satisfying justice while maintaining the principles of legality."

In other words, the Federal Government will not itself make any suggestions to extend the statute of limitations, but will support legislation introduced in Parliament that is designed to do just that. A Bundestag debate on extension of the statute is scheduled for March 10.

The cautious tone of the Cabinet statement was a case of political egg-walking. Dr. Ewald Bucher, West Germany's Minister of Justice, has steadfastly maintained that the statute could not be legally extended and has threatened to resign if the Cabinet did not accept his recommendations.

Dr. Bucher went along with a Cabinet decision that in effect shifted responsibility for action to Parliament. Apparently Dr. Bucher felt he could go along with the Cabinet, says the New York Times, since it was not specifically repudiating its previous position and in so doing rejecting his own recommendations.

The vote actually was to approve a report on the action taken against Nazi criminals to be presented to the Bundestag. The Government statement declared the investigation and prosecution of Nazi misdeeds was "unique in extent in all legal history."

The report noted that about 70,000 Germans had already been sentenced for Nazi war crimes in West Germany and abroad and that under systematic investigations not yet completed 13,000 other prosecutions were under way.

The Government pointed out that it had appealed to the na-
